1 INTRODUCTION

Public concern about the health effects from exposure to radon has greatly increased the demand for companies qualified to measure radon and radon decay products in indoor air. The U.S. Environmental Protection Agency's Office of Radiation Programs operates the National Radon Measurement Proficiency (RMP) Program, managed by the Radon Division. Under this program, any company offering measurement services is invited to demonstrate its proficiency in measuring indoor radon gas and radon decay product concentrations. Companies meeting all the program requirements for a given method and device are listed in this Cumulative Proficiency Report (CPR).

The program's objective is to assist States and the public in selecting companies that have demonstrated competence in measuring indoor radon and radon decay products. This objective is achieved by evaluating, on an EPA scheduled basis, the proficiency of companies' measurements and the quality of their data management. Companies that successfully demonstrate their proficiency are listed in this Cumulative Proficiency Report. The RMP program's long-term objectives are to promote standard measurement procedures and establish quality assurance procedures for measurement companies.

The National RMP Program does not accredit measurement companies nor does it certify, recommend, or endorse participating companies. The inclusion of a company in this report should not be interpreted as a certification or accreditation of that company. This report simply lists measurement companies that have demonstrated a capability for measuring radon and/or radon decay products.

The testing periods are referred to as test "rounds." A company enrolls its measurement method(s) for evaluation. A primary company is defined as having its own analysis capability for radon measurement, but may or may not offer measurement services directly to the public. A secondary company offers services ranging from detector distribution to home inspection and consultation but does not have its own analysis capability. It must use one of the primary companies for its detector analyses.

This Cumulative Proficiency Report lists the primary companies in four tables (See Section 5). Although only primary companies were evaluated for their proficiency, they listed secondary companies affiliated with them in their application. EPA did not evaluate these secondary companies.

The secondary companies listed by primary companies that are included in this report are listed alphabetically by State in an appendix to this report. EPA suggests that only secondary companies affiliated with a CPR listed primary company be used. These secondary companies were not evaluated by EPA.

2 RMP PROGRAM REQUIREMENTS

For each method, participants must send with their applications a copy of the operating instructions they provide homeowners and/or those used by an instrument operator. These instructions must reflect the measurement procedures found in the EPA documents, "Indoor Radon and Radon Decay Product Measurement Protocols" and "Interim Protocols for Screening and Followup Radon and Radon Decay Product Measurements". They must be accepted by, and on file with, EPA by the deadline specified on that round's schedule.

Once enrolled, a company must meet EPA's minimum screening-measurement requirements for each method, and all detector and analysis result deadlines. Applications, detectors, and analyses reporting forms received after scheduled deadlines are not considered in the performance evaluation process. A company must meet all program requirements each round to be listed as proficient.

The EPA instructs the primary companies to submit a specific number of their detectors for exposure to known levels of radon and radon decay products. After exposure in a federal radon chamber, EPA returns the detectors to the company without revealing the radon gas or radon decay product concentration. The company analyzes the detector(s) and reports its measurements to the EPA. The EPA compares these measurements with the known levels of exposure. If the company's results are within the established screening-measurement criterion, it passes the performance test with that method.

In test round six (March - December 1989) only primary companies were tested to determine their proficiency in measuring radon/radon decay products. Secondary companies were not tested.

To be listed in this report a primary company had to:

(1) meet all program application requirements,

(2) submit test results within the 25% performance limit for:

  (a) The announced test, and
  (b) The double-blind test, as appropriate.

Primary companies that successfully participated in test round five were required to submit a new application for test round six to be listed. These companies were not subject to an announced test. Primary companies that submitted an application for the first time were subject to an announced test. There was no provision for a retest in test round six.

In addition to the announced test, all applicants in three measurement categories were also subject to a double-blind test (DBT). For the first time, EPA included a double-blind test for three of nine measurement methods covered by the National RMP, i.e., Activated Charcoal Adsorption (AC), Charcoal Liquid Scintillation (LS), and Alpha Track Detection (AT).

The DBT was conducted in the same manner and using the same performance criteria as the announced test. However, companies did not know when the blind test was conducted or that they were tested. The double-blind test was intended to double check the performance of companies in providing routine radon measurement services to the consumer.

Only primary companies that meet general program requirements, the requirements of the announced test or the double-blind test are listed in this report.

3 SELECTING A MEASUREMENT METHOD

Several different measurement methods may be used to determine the radon or radon decay product concentrations in houses. In practice, the choice of a method by a homeowner is often dictated simply by availability -- if an adequate method is available, it is used. If alternative methods are available, then the cost or the duration of the measurement may become the deciding factor.

The EPA has developed measurement protocols for nine different methods and believes that any of them, when used in accordance with EPA protocols, can produce valid results. This does not mean that all measurements made according to the suggested protocols will produce results with identical certainties. However, it does mean that the listed methods are capable of producing adequate results for screening or followup purposes.

Each method has its own advantages and disadvantages. Users must decide which method is best suited to their situation. The following sections detail the characteristics of the nine methods, pointing out some of the advantages and disadvantages of each one. This summary is not exhaustive, but is intended to guide the user in making an informed selection of a measurement method.

3.1 Continuous Radon Monitoring (CR) and Continuous Working-Level Monitoring (CW)

These measurement methods are similar because they both use an electronic detector to accumulate and store information related to the periodic (usually hourly) average concentrations of radon gas or radon decay products (working level). They are deployed in houses according to guidelines in the EPA protocol, and then turned on, or programmed for, the desired operating time -- a minimum of six hours for screening and twenty-four hours for followup measurements. At the end of the test, the monitor must be retrieved, and the results must be analyzed by a skilled instrument operator.

Advantages

- Relatively short measurement duration.
- Hourly results can track the variation of concentration in the house.
- Very precise (most models).
- Results are available on-site (for CW).

Disadvantages

- Relatively expensive, cost may range from $100 to $300, depending on the type of services provided.
- Requires a skilled instrument operator.
- This measurement, as does any short-term measurement, requires careful control of closed-house conditions twelve hours before and during the test.
- Because of the highly reactive nature of radon decay products, the continuous working-level measurements are much more susceptible to sampling error than radon gas measurements.

3.2 Alpha-Track Detection (AT)

The alpha-track method measures radon. The detector is a small sheet of special plastic material enclosed in a container with a filter-covered opening. The radon gas that enters the container decays, emitting alpha particles. The particles strike the plastic sheet, leaving tracks that can be chemically enhanced and counted using a microscope or an automated counting system.

The detectors are deployed in the home according to guidelines in the EPA protocol. They are left for periods of up to three months for screening and twelve months for followup measurements. At the end of the desired testing period, they must be returned to the distributor or analytical laboratory for processing and evaluation.

Advantages

- Relatively low-cost services; cost may range from $20 to $60.
- No special skills required for making the measurement.
- Can be distributed by mail.
- Completely passive, needs no external power.
- Can measure the long-term average concentrations over a twelve-month period, which is the optimal measurement of long-term concentrations.

Disadvantages

- Relatively long measurement period necessary; three months is the recommended minimum for most detectors.

3.3 Activated Charcoal Adsorption (AC) and Charcoal Liquid Scintillation (LS)

Both of these methods utilize activated charcoal adsorption to sample radon gas but different equipment is used for analysis. The detectors for these methods consist of variously configured containers filled with a measured amount of activated charcoal. The container is usually perforated or screened to keep the charcoal from falling out, and some have a filter to keep out radon decay products. All charcoal adsorbers are stored in airtight containers when not being used for sampling.

Charcoal adsorbers can be received through the mail from a distributor. They are deployed in the home for up to seven days according to guidelines in the EPA protocols. At the end of testing, the adsorber is resealed and returned to the distributor or analytical laboratory for processing and evaluation.

Advantages

- Low cost for services; costs may range from $10 to $25.
- Can be distributed by mail.
- No special skills needed for making the measurement.
- Completely passive, needs no external power.
- With proper analysis, can yield precise results.

Disadvantages

- Some charcoal adsorbers are more sensitive than others to temperature and humidity.
- Limited to short-term testing.
- Requires, as does any short-term measurement, careful control of closed-house conditions twelve hours before and during the test.

3.4 RPISU - Radon Progeny Integrating Sampling Unit (RP)

The RPISU method measures radon decay products. RPISU detectors have a controlled flow-rate air pump that pulls air continuously through a detector assembly. Depending on the model, the unit can be installed and operated by homeowners or skilled operators for three days or longer, according to guidelines in the EPA protocol. At the end of that time, the homeowner sends it to the distributor, or an operator removes the unit and returns it to the analysis laboratory for processing and evaluation.

Advantages

- Directly measures concentrations of radon decay products.
- Relatively short measurement period.
- The detector assembly and some entire units can be sent by mail.
- There is extensive experience in the use of RPISU's; therefore, measurement errors are well established.

Disadvantages

- Relatively expensive; cost may range from $40 to $150, depending on type of service provided.
- Some models may be both heavy and awkward to move.
- May be limited to locations with AC power.
- Some units must be installed and picked up by a skilled instrument operator.
- Because of the highly reactive nature of radon decay products, measurements are much more susceptible to sampling error than radon gas measurements.

3.5 Grab Radon (GR) and Grab Working-Level (GW)

The grab sampling methods measure concentrations of radon gas or radon decay product concentrations (working-level). The radon grab sample is most commonly collected for later analysis in a special flask holding 100 to 2,000 cubic centimeters of air. A grab radon sample can also be obtained by pumping air through an activated charcoal canister. The radon decay product grab sample is collected by drawing air through a filter, upon which radon decay products, if present in the air, are collected. Both types of samples can be acquired simultaneously with some detector systems. All sampling should be done in accordance with guidelines in the EPA protocols.

For results of the grab radon test, operators must return to their offices to analyze the exposed flasks/canisters, and must delay the analysis for at least four hours after the testing. For most grab working-level (radon decay products) tests, operators can perform the analysis on location in an hour or less.

Advantages

- Results are quickly obtained.
- Equipment can be portable.
- Some detector systems can sample both radon gas and radon decay products simultaneously.
- Can acquire and evaluate several samples per day.
- Conditions during the measurement are known to the operator.

Disadvantages

- Relatively expensive; costs may range from $80 to $300, depending on the type of services offered.
- Very short measurement periods may not be representative of the long-term average concentrations.
- Requires a skilled operator.
- Requires, as does any short-term measurement, careful control of closed-house conditions twelve hours before and during the test.
- Because of the highly reactive nature of radon decay products, grab radon decay product measurements are much more susceptible to sampling error than radon gas measurements.

3.6 EIC - Electret Ion Chamber (EC)

The EIC is an integrating detector used to measure radon gas. It is a canister containing a charged electret which reacts to the radiation emitted from radon and radon decay products.

EICs can be received through the mail and installed in a home according to guidelines in the EPA protocol for two to seven days or one to twelve months, respectively, for short or long-term types. At the end of the testing period, it is resealed and returned to the analytical laboratory for processing and evaluation.

Advantages

- The EIC is a relatively inexpensive (cost may range from $8 - $25) small detector that produces a result that is a true integrated average radon concentration.
- Two types of EICs are available, allowing the method to be used for both short-term and long-term measurements.
- The laboratory analysis of electret ion chambers is nondestructive, allowing results to be verified if necessary.

Disadvantages

- EICs need to be correct for background gamma radiation, necessitating a background check and subtraction of an increment of voltage.

5 HOW TO USE THE TABLES

The first three tables in this report provide information about primary companies that have met program requirements for test round six. When used together, these tables can provide information on proficient primary companies; how and where to contact them, and the states served with a given measurement method/device. Some companies offer radon measurement services for more than one measurement method, and more than one brand or type of device within a method.

Table 1: States Served by Primary Company by Method; Alphabetic Within Method

Proficient primary companies are listed alphabetically in each of the nine methods in the RMP program. For each company measurement method/device, the states served are shown in alphabetical line order. Simply find the two letter abbreviation of the state you are interested in and follow that column entry vertically through the table to find those companies serving that state with a given measurement method/device. If the state is not listed the company does not offer its service in that area. After selecting a company go to Table 2 for address, telephone, and other information. The seven digit number beside the company name is an EPA identification number useful in distinguishing companies with the same name in Table 2. Similarly, the four digit number beside the states served relates to a specific measurement method and company address listed in Table 2.

Table 2: Primary Companies by Name, Address, and Telephone Number

Proficient primary companies are listed alphabetically, along with their address, telephone number, and the measurement methods/devices available, including brand type and model information for most of the detectors which can be ordered through the mail. Note that some companies are listed as proficient with more than one brand or type of radon detector for the same measurement methods.

Table 3: Primary Companies by State and Measurement Methods; Alphabetic Within State

Proficient primary companies with measurement methods offered to all US States and Territories are listed alphabetically under "National." Those companies offering measurement methods in selected states are listed with those methods under the individual state headings. Like Table 1 this table is intended as a quick reference for identifying company service areas. After selecting a company refer to Table 2 for other company information.

Table 4: Incomplete Evaluations

Primary companies with incomplete evaluations are listed with address, telephone number, detector type, and service area information. EPA has not completed National RMP Program Round 6 evaluations for the companies listed. This report will be amended after the evaluations are complete. Refer to Table 1 above for instructions on how to use the information given. This table combines the types of information found in Tables 1 and 2. Please see the above instructions for the service area information given. These companies are also listed with other methods in Tables 1, 2, and 3.

APPENDIX
Secondary Companies

Primary companies submitting application for Round 6 of the National Radon Measurement Proficiency (RMP) Program also submitted the names, addresses, and telephone numbers of all secondary companies they supply with detectors for sale to the public. This appendix lists companies alphabetically under the state in which they are located. Anyone purchasing detectors from one of these companies should verify that the primary company performing analysis on the detectors has met all requirements for Test Round 6 of the National RMP Program. This list is furnished as an additional source of radon detector distributors. The secondary company information provided by the primary companies has not been verified.
